

Founders' Letter

For more than two decades, the Satter Foundation has worked to improve the lives of the world's most vulnerable people and to protect its most valuable environments. It's a humbling endeavor: The needs are vast and the setbacks are frequent. But despite the challenges, we have seen our grantee partners achieve meaningful impact—in our hometown of Chicago and around the globe.

The organizations we support are helmed by bold leaders and are driven by ambitious visions: ending mass atrocities, providing all children access to quality education, eradicating disease and easing suffering, ensuring that all people can partake in the dignity of work, and preserving our land and water for generations to come. They bring their significant expertise and on-the-ground know-how to their work. The foundation, in turn, tries to extend a net of resources, counsel, and connections to them as they implement risky business plans and attempt to reach beyond the status quo.

In this year's report, we reflect on the connections we have woven throughout the years: between the foundation and our grantees, between grantees and others in our networks, and between the grantees themselves. These connections have sparked conversations, uncovered innovations, and expanded the base of support for many of the organizations with which we partner. For example, we have been glad to help spur the growth of grantees like the Navy SEAL Foundation, the US Olympic and Paralympic Foundation, Perspectives Charter Schools, and the Global Health Initiative Fund, to name a few, by introducing them to new donors and bringing attention to their achievements.

Indeed, our annual reports are another way we hope to connect you to our grantees and to the many exciting approaches they are taking to make lasting change. In the pages that follow, you will read about:

- The breakthrough clinical trials supported by Gateway for Cancer Research that give promise and hope to those suffering from the disease.
- Above and Beyond Family Recovery Center's personalized approach to helping those who wrestle with addiction.
- How Northwestern Academy Evanston opens educational doors for first-generation students, leading them to opportunities to which they would otherwise have no access.
- The Global Health Initiative Fund's ambitious plans to be the bedrock of a groundbreaking global health institute that will train generations of researchers, health care providers, and academics.
- How students at Perspectives Charter Schools are developing into ethical leaders who are equipped to make the world more peaceful and just.

We are grateful to you and for all that our partners do to make our world better. We hope you are as inspired by these stories as we are, and we welcome you to reach out if you would like us to connect you with these organizations.

Sincerely,

Mure a fifther Muneer Satter

Connecting for Impact

The Satter Foundation grantees rarely work in isolation. They often partner with donors—like our foundation—aligned nonprofit organizations, and community and thought leaders to further their reach, fill needed gaps, and learn from the experience of others. They also foster authentic connections among their partners and those they serve, which reinforces the impact they create, ensuring the positive change they make in the world lasts.

"We are very keen on figuring out how to connect with the cancer-research community, how to engage more researchers, and how to receive, as a result of that work, even more high-quality proposals for us to consider," says Gateway for Cancer Research Interim President Michael Burton on the importance of finding partners in the fight against cancer. (Read more on page 8.)

"When one person transforms their life from something that's devastatingly sad to something that's wonderful, it helps the community. When someone becomes well and healthy and vigorous again, their family's lives are lifted. And when you keep doing it, the community starts to improve. We'll see stronger communities when people realize that they can positively transform their lives," says Bryan Cressey, founder of Above and Beyond Family Recovery Center. (Read more on page 10.)

"Our cohort model fosters peer-to-peer connections between students in the same grade who are seeking the same goal, who they can relate to, and with whom they can create a support network," says Amy Pratt, PhD, assistant dean for community education partnerships at Northwestern University, which runs the Northwestern Academy - Evanston program, on the importance of developing multiple avenues of support for students. (Read more on page 12.)

"The Global Health Initiative Fund has reached out across disciplines and across institutions to find collaborative models upon which to grow our impact," says Robert Havey, MD, the fund's director and founder. This intersection of many different disciplines effectively helps address challenges from numerous angles in innovative ways. (Read more on page 14.)

"Our values bind us together. You can't walk in and out of a Perspectives school and not experience what it means to live our principles. They bring the curriculum to the community, particularly through the annual peace march. That outreach is powerful," says Perspectives Charter Schools President and Founder Diana Shulla-Cose. (Read more on page 16.)

Gateway for Cancer Research

Gateway for Cancer Research provides funding to promising early-phase clinical trials for cancer treatments, supporting the development of therapies that make patients feel better, live longer, and conquer the disease. Its vision is to create a world in which a cancer diagnosis is no longer feared.

Its methods: Founded by Board Chairman Richard Stephenson in 1991, Gateway for Cancer Research is the only cancer-research organization that exclusively funds phase I and phase II clinical trials, filling a much-needed gap in the funding ecosystem. It makes grants to advance research on any type of cancer at any stage of the disease, focusing on emerging areas of science that show great promise, such as immunotherapy. Most Gateway-funded trials occur at National Cancer Institute—designated comprehensive cancer centers, including Memorial Sloan Kettering, MD Anderson, and St. Jude Children's Research Hospital.

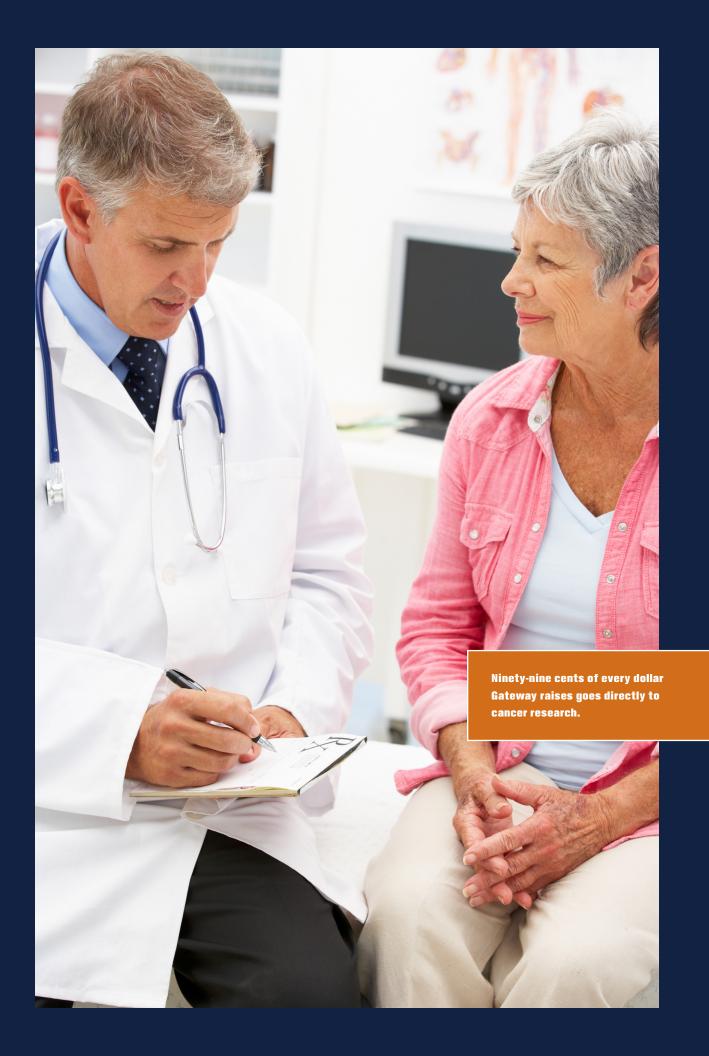

"We act as a bridge to ensure that creative and innovative ideas that are conceived and tested in basic labs are translated into the patient population through early-phase trials," says Michael Burton, Gateway's interim president. The organization most often funds investigator-initiated trials that wouldn't typically attract industry funding or other sources of funding. "It's akin to investing in a startup," Burton explains. "While many trials in phase I and phase II don't advance, there's a strong likelihood that you are going to see a return on the investment in those that do." The organization also fills the ever-widening funding gap caused by declines in government funding. "Principal investigators need financial support to advance their trials, and Gateway is there for them," Burton adds.

Its impact: Since 1991, Gateway has funded more than 170 trials, impacting more than 5,500 adults and children with cancer. It has invested more than $85 million in cancer research, providing invaluable support to clinical trials that would not have proceeded otherwise. Seventy percent of Gateway-funded trials progress to the next phase of research, which has led to breakthroughs in breast and ovarian cancer, as well as pediatric cancers.

How the Satter Foundation has helped:

The Satter Foundation is a strong champion of Gateway. "The foundation provides invaluable unrestricted funding to our organization, which we invest directly in our work," says Burton. "We have also benefited from the foundation's wonderful reputation to help attract other funders."

What's next for Gateway: Gateway is focused on continuing to achieve strong outcomes and to build strong relationships with the cancerresearch community. It is committed to supporting "entrepreneurial clinician investigators who are deeply committed to changing the face of cancer," Burton explains. "It is essential that the right clinicians and researchers know about us and our mission and understand that there is a source of support for their work."

Above and Beyond Family Recovery Center

Above and Beyond Family Recovery Center provides holistic, individualized, and evidence-based addiction treatment to marginalized Chicagoans with a history of unemployment, homelessness, and substance abuse. The three-year-old organization, which operates one outpatient facility on the West Side, also connects clients to employment and housing supports—all free of charge.

Its methods: "I had a vision to re-create addiction treatment in America," Founder Bryan Cressey says. "Every other industry has innovated, but this one has been the same for 80 years. And I wanted to provide services to people who couldn't normally access good treatment."

Above and Beyond is unique in that it brings half a dozen addiction treatment programs and 27 group meetings under one roof. While most substanceabuse centers offer just one program-such as Alcoholics Anonymous (AA)—Above and Beyond affords each client the opportunity to experiment to find the core treatment program that works best for them. "With AA, you have to admit you're powerless," says Executive Director Dan Hostetler. "With another program, called SMART Recovery, you begin with 'I'm powerful.' It often works for people for whom AA doesn't." This innovative approach increases clients' likelihood of getting and staying sober, Cressey believes. "People are way more likely to be successful when their treatment's foundation is consonant with their own beliefs," he says.

In addition to addressing underlying psychological challenges and teaching self-love, Above and Beyond requires each client to participate in logotherapy, which aims to help clients find their life purpose. Clients can also attend a plethora of group meetings and services, such as individual counseling, yoga therapy, and acupuncture. And the organization provides employment-readiness training and case management to help clients find housing.

Its impact: In the organization's three years of operation, it has opened its doors to about 4,000 people seeking treatment, of whom about one-quarter have gone on to successfully complete the program. Ultimately, Above and Beyond hopes to measure success by the number of graduates who are still sober after three years, but it has just reached the point where it can begin to track those numbers. "We want to transform lives," Cressey says, "so we will measure success when, after three years, a graduate is not troubled by addiction, is reunited with their family, has a job, and has housing—because without those things, their sobriety won't last."

How the Satter Foundation has helped:

The foundation was one of the first donors to back the organization. In addition, sitting down with Muneer and Kristen to discuss the organization's operations and vision has been "extremely valuable," Cressey says. The foundation also has a higher risk tolerance than some other funders, he adds, which means it is more willing to "invest in new ways of doing things."

What's next for Above and Beyond:

Above and Beyond hopes to open a center on the South Side, which is home to many low-income and homeless individuals. "After that, we hope to open more centers around Chicago, and then probably in other cities," Cressey says. "And when we feel we've got a program that's recognized as extremely innovative and others around the country want to try it, we might license it, recognizing that we can't build new centers fast enough to serve all those in need."

Northwestern Academy - Evanston

Northwestern Academy – Evanston provides continuous, holistic academic support and career counseling to high-potential, academically motivated, underrepresented first-generation students from low-to middle-income families in the Chicago suburb of Evanston, Illinois. The four-year academic-enrichment program, which is part of the Northwestern University School of Education and Social Policy Office of Community Education Partnerships (OCEP), prepares students to attend and graduate from selective four-year colleges and universities.

Its methods: The program works with participating students to ensure they have all the support they may need during their four years of high school. Academy staff members meet regularly with the students, their families, and school administrators and faculty, and coordinate strategies among them to address academic and social-emotional learning challenges. It provides the students the opportunity to be tutored by Northwestern undergraduate and graduate students, supports finding and funding opportunities for summer enrichment classes at universities (including Northwestern), and holds workshops on personal development to help students navigate the new or difficult experiences they will face in high school and college. It even provides opportunities for students to participate in advanced academic programs and internships, such as working-as one student has-as a paid assistant to a Northwestern faculty member at one of the only labs in the world researching regenerative genetics.

"We're really able to get to know the students and help them in all different areas, whether it's finding the correct level of classes or helping them better communicate with their counselors and teachers," says Karina Morales, the program's advisor and coordinator. And because the students participate in a cohort, younger students can see themselves in older students. "It shows them the success they can have and where they can end up," says Amy Pratt, PhD, assistant dean for OCEP.

In addition, Northwestern Academy – Evanston dedicates significant resources to preparing students and their families for the college admissions process.

The program guides both the parents, who may be new to the process, and the students as they prepare for entrance exams, consider which colleges would be the best fit, and submit applications. The program's staff members have also traveled with students to visit colleges across the country.

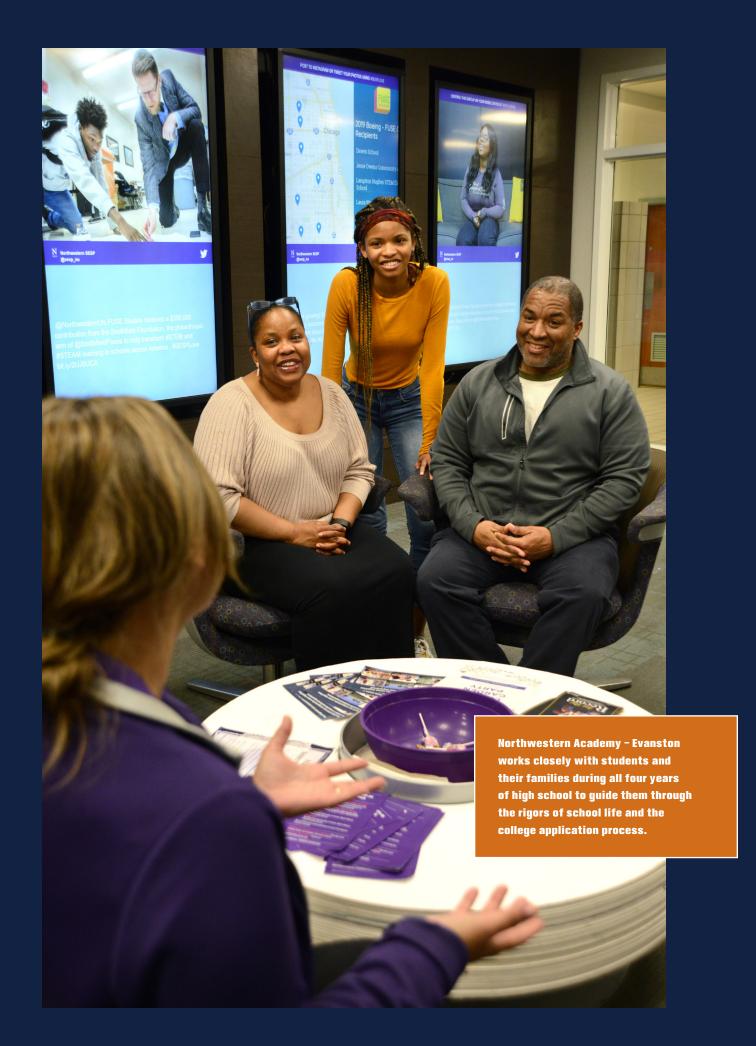

Its impact: Northwestern Academy – Evanston's first cohort to receive four full years of support graduated high school in May 2018. All eight students have enrolled in a four-year college or university, including the University of Pennsylvania, Cornell University, Ohio Wesleyan University, and the College of the Holy Cross. Says one graduate, "Northwestern Academy – Evanston has given me the ability to do things I hadn't ever considered being an option for me."

How the Satter Foundation has helped:

As a member of the School of Education and Social Policy's advisory board, Kristen has provided consistent leadership and support to the school and the program.

What's next for Northwestern Academy-Evanston: The program plans to refine its application process to ensure it attracts the students application process to ensure it attracts the students and families with the most need and the most potential for success. The program is also working to increase engagement with cohort parents. And it's looking to enhance collaboration with Northwestern's many programs and services to prepare students for college life. It hopes to continue to introduce them to the resources available in college and showcase more opportunities for learning and growth.

Global Health Initiative Fund

The Global Health Initiative (GHI) Fund prepares medical students at Northwestern University's Feinberg School of Medicine for a career in global health care and supports disease-specific research done by faculty and residents at Northwestern Medicine by providing them with opportunities to train, practice, and research in underserved countries.

Its methods: GHI seeks to cultivate the next generation of global health providers, particularly by sending Northwestern University medical students and residents on elective rotations in underserved countries around the world and by supporting faculty members as they research diseases abroad. "GHI allows medical students, residents, and faculty to provide care, deliver supplies, and conduct basic and clinical research, helping hundreds of thousands of people and developing new solutions to old global health problems along the way," says Robert Havey, MD, the fund's director and founder, the deputy director for the Institute for Global Health, and clinical professor of medicine at Feinberg School of Medicine.

The fund partners with academic medical institutions around the globe. For example, it supported a large randomized clinical trial for improving post—heart attack care in India, sent a team of pediatricians and cardiologists to Lebanon to care for Syrian refugees, and partnered with institutions in an impoverished region in Brazil to aid those suffering from injury and disability. Not only do these efforts improve the lives of those who receive care directly, they give the next generation of doctors the chance to observe firsthand diseases they might not readily encounter during their training as well.

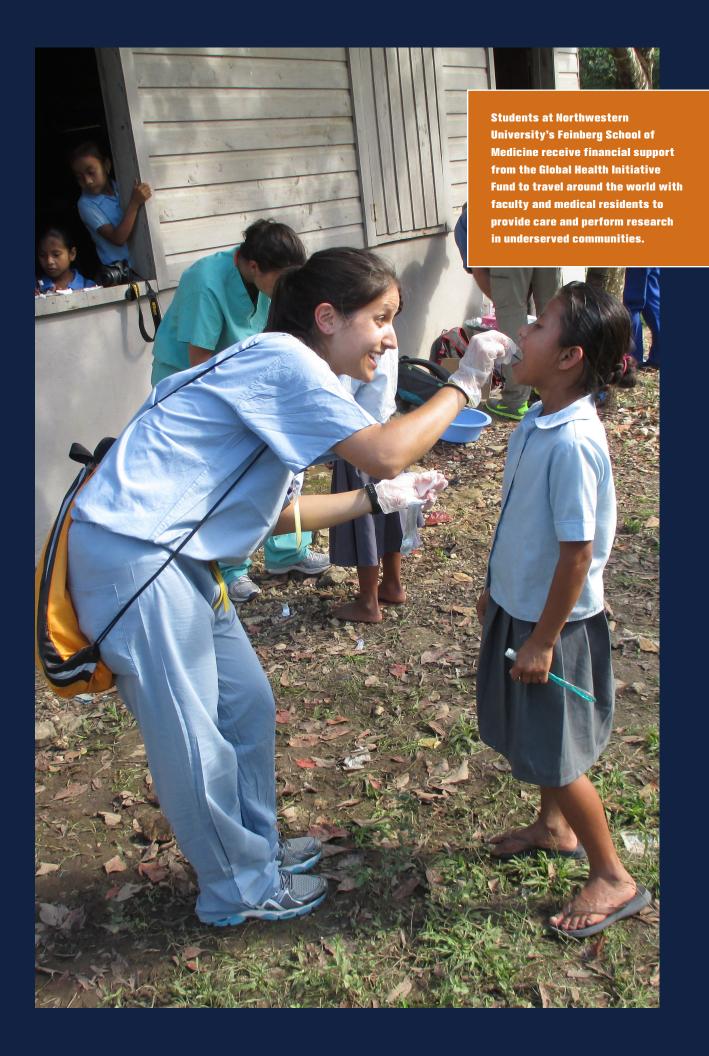

Its impact: GHI has helped send more than 1,200 Northwestern medical students and residents on rotations in over 45 underserved countries around the world. It is also achieving its mission of driving new talent to the global health field. More than half of its students take advantage of opportunities to participate in international rotations, as compared to the national average of about 27 percent.

How the Satter Foundation has helped:

In addition to its financial support, the Satter Foundation serves as a champion for GHI and its efforts, which increases GHI's visibility and its opportunities in the global health field. "The Satter Foundation has been a steadfast supporter for many years, but even more important, support from the Satter Foundation has helped showcase our work to a broad audience, expanding our impact," says Havey.

What's next for the Global Health Initiative Fund: GHI has recently taken on the role of financial backbone of the Institute for Global Health, Northwestern's new hub for global health programs from across the university. It will bring together five centers focused on global health research and education in intersecting diseasespecific areas such as oncology, cardiovascular health, and e-health. Its mission will be to reduce health disparities, improve health care, and strengthen health systems around the world. It hopes to expand existing programs that GHI funds, including the international rotations for medical students and residents. "There are so many problems in this global health arena that we clearly have an enormous amount of work to do," says Havey. Still, he is confident that the work of the new institute will help "secure a better world for all of us."

Perspectives Charter Schools

Founded in 1997, Perspectives Charter School was one of the first charter schools in Illinois. Now a network of five schools, it serves nearly 1,800 students in grades 6 to 12 in three underserved neighborhoods on Chicago's South Side. Perspectives' open-enrollment, tuition-free schools focus on academics and character development to help students grow into ethical leaders.

Its methods: "Our vision is to wrap knowledge, values, and experiences around our students so that they have opportunities to soar in college, careers, and life, and to empower them to have a sense of agency," says President and Founder Diana Shulla-Cose. To that end, Perspectives emphasizes academic rigor, experiential learning, the development of social-emotional skills, and ethics, which together make up the network's educational model, called A Disciplined Life. The model is based on 26 principles that guide students to cultivate positive selfperception, build and maintain healthy relationships, and develop tools for productivity. Examples include "be a lifelong learner," "show compassion," and "take initiative."

"The principles guide everything we do," Shulla-Cose says. "It's our language, our culture, and our curriculum." Perspectives also uses the city as its classroom. The schools take field trips into the community several times a year, host monthly speaker series with public figures, and connect students to professional internships and career shadow programs. "Our ultimate goal is to develop ethical leaders," she says. "When our students leave as 18-year-olds, they're not only empowered and ready for college or a career, they're compassionate and just. They are problem solvers and social-justice advocates."

Its impact: One hundred percent of Perspectives' graduates are accepted to college, and the schools graduate about 95 percent of their seniors. Additionally, over 90 percent of freshmen are on track to graduate, which, Shulla-Cose says, is a critical indicator of overall high school success. What's more, over half of juniors and seniors earn college credits or certifications while enrolled at Perspectives.

Outside the classroom, students are leading actions to curb violence in their communities. With the school's support, they began a movement called I Am For Peace—which became the subject of a documentary by the same name—and host an annual march to share the principles of A Disciplined Life in hopes of achieving a more peaceful Chicago.

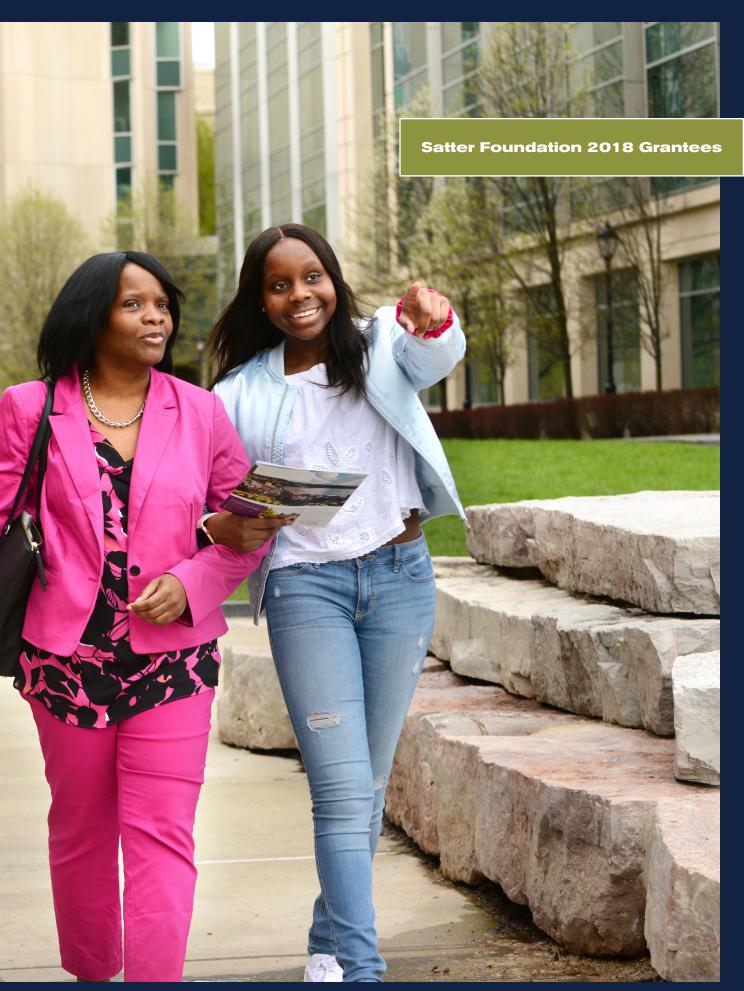

How the Satter Foundation has helped:

Along with providing sustained annual support, the Satter Foundation made a matching grant to help the organization relocate one of its schools to a more modern and centrally located campus. "The Satter Foundation gift was instrumental in launching this project," says Shulla-Cose. "It was the first investment in this vision and it catapulted the campaign." In addition, Muneer connected the school to a financing source for the debt funding it needed to expand.

What's next for Perspectives: In addition to opening the new campus, Perspectives is directing more resources to personalized learning—an approach that emphasizes meeting each student where they are—and is increasing efforts to help students plan for college and careers earlier in high school. And, Shulla-Cose says, Perspectives is exploring ways to license and share the Disciplined Life model with other schools across the country.

Providing Educational Opportunities

Education is a focus of the foundation because a quality education can unlock a multitude of doors. With access to knowledge, skills, and character development, students around the globe can step into steady employment and out of poverty. They are also equipped to address intractable challenges in their field, their communities, and the world at large, multiplying the impact of their education many times over.

Supporting & Honoring Veterans

Our veterans make unimaginable sacrifices to protect our freedoms. The foundation honors them and their families by supporting organizations committed to helping them access education and job opportunities, caring for their minds and bodies, and tending to those many have left behind.

Grantees such as the Navy SEAL Foundation provide education, health, and job-related services to veterans and their families.
